Canadian

Most Canadian whiskies are blended multi-grain liquors containing a large percentage of corn spirits, and are typically lighter and smoother than other whisky styles. Several hundred years ago, when Canadian distillers began adding small amounts of highly-flavorful rye grain to their mashes people began demanding this new rye-flavored whisky, referring to it simply as "rye".

Islay Malt

Islay is very largely composed of peat, layer upon layer of spagnum mosses and other vegetation have been rotting away and created the compact black banks of peat which are used for home fuel and for the whisky industry. Most of the water on Islay is brown, even the water in the burns is brown, and winter gales drive salt spray far inland, and this saturates the peat, which is dried again by the briny, seaweedy breeze. All these characteristics go into the whiskies of Islay, to a greater or lesser extent

French

Michel Couvreur, originally from Belgium, makes Scotch Whisky in the heart of Burgundy (Bouze-Les-Beaune). In the 1950's he arrived in Burgundy to make and market wine. After he moved to England in 1960s, he became involved in the production process of whisky made from a selection of the most ancient strains of cereals and using extremely rare sherry casks.

English

England is not very well known for making whisky, there were distillers operating in until the late 19th century, after which production of English single malt whisky ceased until 2003. In 2013 The London Distillery Company began production of the first single malt whisky.

Sweden

The Box Distillery lies beside the Angerman River in Adalen around 100km north of Sundsvall in northern Sweden. With its source lying deep in the mountains, the river provides us with almost unlimited access to crystal clear, chilled water – a defining factor in creating a rich, character filled distillation. For much of the year, the temperature of this water is only a few degrees above freezing. This fresh mountain water is an exclusive resource which allows us to distil more effectively than in any other location in the world.
